In the years following Time magazine's 2014 declaration that the US had reached a "transgender tipping point," the nation has witnessed the simultaneous increased visibility and inclusion of trans people and increased violence and discrimination against trans communities. Despite its advancements in understandings of sex, gender, sexuality, medicine, and social movements, the discipline of sociology is infrequently called upon to contribute to national discourse on the US trans population. This presidential panel features scholar-activists in sociology and activists in the national transgender rights movement to discuss how to advance transgender justice in and through sociology. Panelists will articulate the sociological insights and expertise that could add to the national conversation on transgender rights and to support the national movement for trans justice. They will also speak to the urgent need to look "in house" at the ways in which the discipline can better include, represent, and support trans-identified scholars and the subfield of trans studies. The panel will close with a Q&A session with the audience.

We have just witnessed the 50th anniversary of the “Stonewall” riots in NYC. This was an important moment in resisting the police brutality and other institutions that operated against people who we now call gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender. For many in the U.S. and abroad, “Stonewall” – the fighting back in the summer of 1969 by gender non-conforming racial minorities – evokes a before and after of visibility, recognition, and the achievement of rights. This panel, comprised of activists, artists, and academics, will offer insights to the moment in time we have reached, speaking to both some of the most critical accomplishments and the losses in the past 50 years for sure, but charting a way of thinking about the next waves of work and organizing that take into account not just sexual orientation and gender identity and expression, but other axes of power.
