About the Bibliography:

In society today, we are presented with a paradox of sorts: on one hand, there have been significant social and political advances regarding sexual orientation and gender identity. Yet, on the other hand, with increasing visibility and progress, there is also a simultaneous and almost inevitable increase in the backlash targeting the most vulnerable segments of the LGBTQ population--trans and non-binary people. In 2017 alone, the Human Rights Campaign has recorded at least 27 death of trans people in the United States due to fatal violence, making it the most violent year against trans people to date. It is also clear that trans violence and oppression disproportionately affects trans women of color, and that racism, sexism, classism, ableism, homophobia, and transphobia intersect in ways that shorten the lives of trans people (Spade 2015). Additionally, trans people experience social, economic, and political marginalization due to the lack of legal representation, barriers to gender-affirming healthcare, legal name and gender changes, physical spaces, and other seemingly neutral administrative systems that enforce narrow binary categories of gender and force people into them in order to get their basic needs met.

In 2016, Sociologists for Trans Justice (S4TJ) was founded by Drs. Eric Anthony Grollman and Laurel Westbrook to organize for justice for trans and non-binary communities through and within sociology. One of the chief aims of Sociologists for Trans Justice is to advance public understanding of trans and non-binary issues – in particular, to enter sociological insights into the national conversation about the status of trans and non-binary communities.

We would like to acknowledge those who were able to help inspire, compile, and adapt this bibliography. ## How to Use this Bibliography:

The purpose of the Trans Studies Bibliography is one of open, public education regarding trans and intersex issues in sociology, academia, and society at large. Similar to other social justice syllabi, the Trans Studies Bibliography is arranged into a 13-week semester (plus one bonus week) of suggested weekly topics framed by a central theme regarding trans justice. Each week includes a list of topical readings and films not limited to sociological perspectives. The bibliography should be understood as an always already impartial list of readings. As such, this bibliography is a live document that is meant to be developed, adapted, shared, and used for educational purposes. We also have provided a syllabus template that you may use to develop your own course.

We would like to note two important things regarding the bibliography. First and foremost, we have worked to incorporate texts throughout the bibliography that apply an intersectional framework. Rather than siloing race, class, ability, sexuality, and other identities to a singular week, we felt that it was important to incorporate them throughout the semester reading so that whiteness and other privileged identities are not normalized. Second, as the bibliography is used and grows, we encourage users to think critically about the politics of citations. We have given great thought about who is cited throughout the bibliography -- questioning both the quality, methods, and motivations behind academic research regarding trans individuals as well as attempting to amplify the voices of trans academics.

We do ask that when this bibliography is used that the source is acknowledged. Acknowledging the source is a means of recognizing the labor of marginalized communities, creating networks, documenting our histories, and tracing power.

Following the recommendations of Dr. Z Nicolazzo, should any person want to honor the labor and effort it takes to create and maintain this bibliography, you can contribute financially to trans people in several ways, including:

1. Making a one-time or ongoing donation to community-based trans organizations;
2. Contributing to causes and initiatives tagged with the #TransCrowdFund hashtag;
3. Ensuring that trans people, particularly trans women of color, are brought to your campus/organization/association and compensated fairly for their intellectual contributions.
4. Volunteering your time to work alongside trans-centered and led committees and organizations including Sociologists for Trans Justice.

Should you want help identifying organizations to contribute to financially and/or with your time, please reference Week 14 of the Weekly Readings section of Dr. Z Nicolazzo's Trans\* Studies in Higher Education syllabus as well as resources provided by S4TJ.

A Note on Accessibility:

We recognize that students come from a variety of backgrounds and have different experiences within the higher education system that may bar their full participation and access to our courses. As such, while we do provide recommended texts, we also provide links to online materials as much as possible to provide free and low-cost access to students.

We also recommend considering ways of making the content and structure of courses more accessible to students, as disabilities can be both visible and invisible and at times inaccessible to students to be diagnosed by the university. Additional resources regarding accessible syllabi and practicing pedagogy can be found here: Accessible Syllabus and here: Trans Inclusive Classrooms.

Weekly Overview:

(Click on the Links to Jump to Sections in Bibliography)

1. Introductions and Definitions

During this first week, the purpose of the readings are to serve as a general overview and introduction to transgender studies and transgender topics. Included are a number of sources that provide 101 guides and definitions. It is important to note, however, that no list is exhaustive and definitions are temporal and contextual. Throughout the semester, we encourage you to return to these earlier topics and think through how these terms and ideas have changed overtime and in different locations for different populations and the social implications of such changes.

2. Methodologies

Following our week of introductions, this week we will begin addressing research on, by, and with trans populations. Specifically, this week, we discuss methodologies of measuring and researching trans populations.

3. Our Past

Continuing our methodology section, this week we discuss previous research on trans populations. As Schilt and Lagos (2017) outline, there have been two major paradigms regarding trans research. The first, which they define as a focus on gender deviance (1960s-1990s), primarily take transgender people up as objects of study to account for the emergence of “the transsexual” as a phenomenon. We highly recommend Schilt and Lagos’s piece as an introduction to these two weeks.

4. Our Present

Concluding the last of the overview sections, this week covers the second research paradigm, called gender difference. This body of research focuses on transgender people as subjects of study, which is largely led by trans populations themselves, including more inclusive and representative data collection methods to more fully and accurately capture the diversity of lived experiences. This week provides a general overview of what sociology of transgender studies is currently.

5. Cisgender

To understand the policing and violence against trans populations, and to advocate for trans justice, we must also understand the power and privilege of the category cis. This week, we discuss how the category cisgender is relational, not an opposite, of transgender.

6. Non-binary, Genderqueer, and Intersex

Research on non-binary, genderqueer, and intersex identities, along with other marginalized gender identities, is a smaller but growing proportion of transgender studies. During this week, we begin thinking beyond the gender binary to other lived possibilities.

7. Local, Global, and Transnational

All too often, people rely on overgeneralizations and cross-cultural comparisons to understand, explain, and justify trans existence (or the lack thereof). This week, the readings explore gender diversity within non-Western contexts to apply a critical framework about what trans means in different locations.

8. Science, Technologies, Medicine, and Bodies

This week, we think critically about the medical, technological, and scientific paradigms of trans people. Many points of contention exist regarding access to psycho-medical diagnoses and hormonal and surgical interventions. The readings presented in this section grapple with both the need as well as the lack of access, agency, and control over trans people’s decisions over their own bodies and identities.

9. Media, Culture, and Trans Narratives

Following the discussion from the previous week regarding ownership and knowledge over trans people's bodies, we continue this discussion during Week 9 to talk about trans narratives, media coverage of trans people, and trans culture. This week, we draw on the concepts introduced in Susan Stryker and Sandy Stone's foundational writings read in week 4 to think of who produces knowledge and what knowledge is consumable regarding trans subjectivities.

10. Institutions and Organizations

In this week, we cover a wider range of topics including, but not limited to, education, families, and work to discuss trans experiences within institutions and organizations. While we discuss other institutions during other weeks such as medicine and the criminal justice system, topics during those weeks can easily also be discussed and connected to this week.

11. Violence and Crime

What is probably one of the more recognized and urgent topics on trans justice, this week we discuss violence and crime against trans populations. We not only provide statistics, however, but also think through what violence and crime is and why trans people are targeted. This week connects well with weeks 2-3 on previous research on trans people.

12. Law and Policy

During our twelfth week, we begin to think about what change looks like. Most often, we as a society resort to human rights, anti-discrimination, or hate law and policy as a response to trans violence and crime. Yet, as we discussed last week, not all violence is intentional nor physical, and not all (if any) traditional solutions involving the criminal justice system provides justice for trans people. As such, what does trans justice look like? This week, we take a critical look into law and policy as reform measures to think about how the law can actually write our marginalization into its own text.

13. Activism

During this final week, we talk about past and current trans activism. We do not think of these as separate instances of activism, but a building upon and towards a trans social justice.

14. Bonus Week: Trans/Feminism

In this bonus week, we include readings to introduce topics on Trans/feminisms and discuss past and current points of contention regarding the boundaries of womanhood. This week pairs well with discussions of violence, research methodologies, institutions, and culture.
